

Finding Light After Loss

The loss of a loved one leaves an indelible mark, a void that can feel insurmountable. For the wife of a beloved patient, the passing of her husband after a long illness cast a shadow of profound loneliness. For a year and a half, she had been his primary caregiver, and his absence left her adrift in a sea of grief. She shared, her voice soft but filled with a quiet strength. "I would close the door and sit in our room, on his bed, thinking only of him. I even found myself following his routines – skipping breakfast, taking afternoon naps, just as he did. I was trapped in the past." Her isolation was compounded by the daily rhythms of her family. Her sons and daughters-in-law went to work, and the grandchildren went to school, leaving her alone with her memories. The silence was deafening.

Initially, Arike provided bereavement support, offering a space for her to process her grief. But her connection with Arike deepened further when she decided to volunteer. "I wanted to contribute," she explained. "I couldn't offer money, but I could offer my time and my hands." She joined the home care team, accompanying staff on home visits, and assisted with preparing medical supplies at the clinic. These simple acts of service became a lifeline.

"Coming to Arike has changed everything," she said. "When I'm here, talking to people, working, I feel alive again. I've realized that others face even greater challenges, and that has helped me put my own grief into perspective." The work at Arike offered her a sense of purpose and connection.

"I feel like I belong here," she expressed, a hint of a smile touching her lips. "Arike has given me a new purpose, a new way to cope. I still miss my husband dearly, but now, I can also look forward to each day." By embracing volunteer work, she has found a way to honor her husband's memory while rediscovering her own strength and resilience.
