

Soulful Connections

The Arike team had been caring for an elderly couple in Kochi, providing medical support and emotional care. The wife had been battling with several health issues related to old age, and our team would visit regularly to provide her with the care and support she needed. Their daughter, who had a psychiatric condition, lived with them. As palliative care team visits became part of their routine, a quiet bond began to form, rooted in trust. The team learned to anticipate needs before they were voiced, and the couple began to look forward to the comforting presence of familiar faces.

Tragedy struck when the wife passed away, leaving behind a grieving husband and daughter. The sense of loss was palpable. For years, the couple had faced life together — now, he faced mornings alone, and the daughter struggled with the absence of her mother's steadying presence. The Arike team rallied around them, providing bereavement support during this difficult time. The husband, who was also our patient, was heartbroken. Despite his own health struggles with diabetes, he showed remarkable kindness to our team. Every time we visited, he would greet us with a warm smile and offer us sweet treats — that he himself couldn't enjoy due to his condition. He would often express his gratitude for our care and support.

The father and daughter looked out for each other, finding comfort in each other's company. As we continue to care for this family, we see the importance of support and kindness in times of need. The bond between the family members and our team has grown stronger, and we're committed to providing ongoing care and support. We're grateful for the opportunity to walk this journey with them and look forward to continuing our support. This story is a reminder that care goes beyond medicine. It's about presence, trust, and small gestures. In the face of grief and change, this family shows us the strength that comes from simple human connection — and the power of showing up, again and again.
