Care Beyond Family: A Community Comes Together

Mrs. X is an elderly woman living alone, with no close relatives to care for her. With age and illness making daily activities difficult, she depends entirely on the support of those around her. What makes her situation remarkable is the way the neighbourhood has come together to ensure she is not left alone in her time of need. Families in the area have informally shared responsibilities—one household takes care of breakfast, another ensures lunch, and someone else arranges dinner. Neighbours visit in turns to assist with bathing, toileting, and other daily needs. A doctor from the Residents Association had been closely monitoring her condition and managing her medicines. Recently, as the doctor had to move abroad, the continuity of care became a concern. At this point, Arike stepped in to provide home-based care, while the same doctor continues to follow up from abroad until returning.

This model of collective care is truly appreciable. It shows how a community can come together and make a meaningful difference in someone's life with shared responsibility and compassion. Palliative care teams should grow within communities to support people around us in such situations. Arike is always supportive in helping communities establish their own care systems—we are ready to mentor and guide.

The Koode volunteer network is also around us, strengthening these efforts at the local level. Let us come together, be part of this movement, and embrace a palliative care culture that ensures dignity and support for all.

Volunteer Diaries

I did not expect to see this many patients living with serious illness and the level of difficulty they face in their daily lives. The extent of need is very high, and I understood how challenging it would be for many people to manage without the support of organisations like Arike. Being part of this experience, I learnt a lot from the team and their work in the field. At the same time, I understood how deeply families are affected. Caregivers take on continuous responsibility, facing physical strain, emotional stress, and financial pressure.

CARE INFO

- Helping Patients Maintain Dignity
- Give privacy. While helping with bathing, dressing, or toileting, ensure proper covering and a comfortable space for the patient.
- Speak with respect. Use a gentle tone and involve the patient in simple day-to-day decisions as much as possible.
- Be mindful during care. Keep the patient's body covered and handle gently to avoid discomfort.
- Offer emotional support. Calling the patient by name, listening patiently, and showing care can help the patient feel valued.
- If unsure, ask. Always check with doctors or nurses when there is any doubt about care.
